These selected paragraphs distill the contents and give you a quick look inside First at the North Pole: His mother had been taken away when he was a small lad, and then he and his father had left town and come to live in the big cabin from which Andy was now trudging so rapidly. . . . Josiah was an older half-brother to Andys father, and the boy had often heard of him as a shiftless, lazy neer-do-well, who drifted from one town to another, seldom keeping a job longer than two or three weeks or a month. . . . Ill keep the papers secret, the lad told himself, and some day, when I get the chance and have the money, Ill go down to Bangor or Portland and get a lawyer to look into the matter for me. . . . The youth tried his best to increase his speed, but the snow was deep in spots, and his long journey to the Storburch camp had tired him, so it took some time to get even within sight of the cabin that was his home. . . . Chet knew Andys story, of Josiah Grahams meanness and laziness, and of the papers left by Andys father
