

A small town has just lost its heart to the ravages of fire. Consumed in the unthinking, unfeeling fingers of flames were all the promises of a bright future the hamlet had, along with the life of its primary benefactor. What happened doesn't seem to matter to those afflicted by the tragedy; all they know is the pain of loss and the fear of uncertain tomorrows. But for those required to bankroll the enterprise, it matters a great deal why, when it seemed that PureWorld Industries was about to explode into a billion dollar boon, it instead lay now in ashes. Kevin Waterbury had to know, before his bosses would sign off on a multi-million dollar loss, he had to have as many of the particulars as there were to be had in the cinders of a once successful and growing business. He knew they had no choice but to pay, that there was no chance of any magic that would make the dollar signs disappear. This was an accident, an awful act of fate. Immediately he thought of his friend, Ethan Powell, a man who had forgotten more about the vengeful nature of fire than many people in the business ever knew. Ethan, with whom he had stood beside in the breath of the dragon so often.
