Not illustrated. 1859 Excerpt: ...lyrics published in 1632; but as none of his English pieces are known, I shall here insert one which turned up the other day amongst the Domestic Correspondence in the State Paper Office, entitled An Elegy dedicated to the eternal memory of the most beautiful and virtuous Lady, Mistress Penelope Noel, daughter to the Lord Viscount Campden, and which, as it was written in the same year in which Milton is believed to have commenced his immortal lyrics, cannot fail to be of interest. AN ELEGY. How fast my griefs come on! how thick a shoal Of sorrows throng about this frightened soul! Wast not enough my dear Amyntas late Was taken from me, by too early fate? Wast not enough, that on great Swedens hearse My muse, astonishd, pinned her mournful verse? But thou, blest saint, before with careful heed My wounds were heald, makst them afresh to bleed; And in my sorrows claimst as large a share, As thy rare beauty and thy virtues were! But tis the hand of heaven, whose doom doth cross My dearest hopes, and triumphs in my loss. Henceforth (though with regret of heart) Ill strive, Where any lives whom I would keep alive, To love with less intention, lest I seem To plot with Death against myself and them. But sure, tins was not all, not my desire CAMP. HOC. K Of thy long life did shoot that raging fire Into thy veins, that burning agues flame Which did to ashes bring the goodliest frame That ever Nature wrought, and did calcine By too strong chymistry the richest mine Of Virtues precious ore. Thine own bright soul, Inflamed with love divine, did still control All earthly thoughts, so that thy agues fire, Working with that of zeal, did soon conspire (To make our sorrows and thy wishes even) Hence to translate a soul allied to heaven. And yet, since h...
